The Interface Between Social Psychology and Educational Psychology: Interactional Phenomena in Educational Settings Gisela Steins,Eva Hammar Chiriac,Tilmann Wilton,2026-03-30 There are numerous social psychological theories models and concepts that explain relevant questions of social phenomena and togetherness on both individual and group level across educational contexts However pedagogical fields of action are only a small spectrum of applied social psychological research just as social psychological phenomena are not a systematic component of theoretical approaches to pedagogical fields of action This interface between social psychology and educational psychology is therefore often not visible Given the crucial role of interactions and dynamics in educational settings there exists a rich tapestry of research opportunities ripe for exploration by social psychologists particularly how interactions of various quality influence the social climate group dynamics motivation learning outcomes and behavioral norms among students and educators The present Research Topic should be understood against this background Ideally relevant work and thoughts on this interface between social psychology and educational psychology would be compiled here at regular intervals This Research Topic aims to bridge the gap between social psychology and educational psychology in educational settings We seek to illuminate how social psychological theories can enhance the depth and diversity and contribute with new perspective and expand knowledge within an educational context on pedagogical issues and by extension contribute to an enhanced understanding and improve the quality of teaching learning and interaction in educational settings Thus with this Research Topic we would like to use the interface between social psychology and educational psychology to draw attention to the many facets of relevant research with social psychological references in the hope that these findings will make an impact into more research and practice For example many concepts that are developed and studied in educational psychology are useful but only work in an appropriate interaction and group context Therefore for a deeper understanding of how educational settings can be organized it is important to always consider the social dimension In an effort to bridge the gap between social psychology and educational psychology and thereby to gather further insights into the application of social psychology within educational settings we welcome articles addressing but not limited to the following themes Dynamics between individuals and groups within educational settings i e students educators and parents etc Research on school and group climate influence health variables and parental engagement Interaction strategies between educators and students i e shared basic values everyone s equal value and handling of challenging situations Research on heterogeneity and inclusion and multi professional teams Dynamic processes i e communication conflict social facilitation loafing group development Educational processes i e self and collective efficacy identity formation gender related identities group work assessment We look forward to contributions that delve into these areas interpreting social psychological insights within the educational sector and fostering a deeper integration of these findings in both academic research and practical applications This Research Topic welcomes Original Research Reviews Mini Reviews Methods Theory and Hypothesis Opinions and Perspectives Federal Register ,2012-11
