Investment issues are now important items on the agenda of international economic policy making and international business government relations. The book provides a detailed analysis of the evolution of the international investment framework in the second half of the twentieth century, the issues, the organizations and current policy challenges. For instance, the book includes chapters on issues concerning the relationship of investment policy to trade and technology competition and economic development. In addition to a clear and well-informed description of the role of several organizations including ITO, GATT, the OECD and the WTO, the authors, one American and one British, present numerous examples, cases and appendices to give context and real-world examples to the book. They also discuss many key regional arrangements such as NAFTA and the EU as well as bilateral investment agreements. This up-to-date and accessible book will be vital reading for academics, students, executives and policy makers concerned to get to grips with the evolving international investment system.
