Summary

This article discusses social and economic conditions of labor in developing countries, using examples from Ghana's labor markets. It investigates the informal sector of urban labor markets, the differentiation and segmentation, and the functioning of labor markets. It stresses the importance of complementing economic analysis with sociological variables. Labor in developing countries is not sufficiently protected. The lack of labor protection and low wages are considered by the governments of developing countries as giving a comparative economic advantage over more developed countries. Thus they are not willing to give up the status quo in order to improve labor conditions in developing countries. In developing countries the issue of labor is how to increase the productiveness of workers, how to achieve social and economic development, and how to become competitive in world markets.

1. Introduction

Labor studies in developed and developing countries deal with different issues, use different theoretical frameworks, and come up with different recommendations for employers, employees, and governments. Developed countries are concerned with employment security, labor conditions, and remaining competitive. In developing countries the issue is how to increase the productiveness of workers, how to achieve social and economic development, and how to become competitive in world markets. The globalization debate brings the two worlds together because they will eventually have to compete on the same world market. At the same time it changes the issues from national labor conditions to the importance of international labor standards. Just as green protectionism threatens developing countries not respecting international environmental
