

Nature-Connection

Nature-connection is much more than just being in nature or exposed to nature, it is about actively engaging (and connecting) with the natural world.

Physical Benefits

Greater nature-connection increases Heart Rate Variability; lowers blood pressure; improves immune system functioning; and reduces levels of Cortisol, the stress hormone.

Psychological Benefits

Spending time in nature to increase your nature-connection can boost mood, and reduce anxiety and chronic stress.

Modern World Disconnection

Increasingly people are becoming disconnected from nature and this can have a negative effect on their physical, psychological and emotional wellbeing and also their cognitive functioning.

Improved Creativity

Natural environments and engaging in nature-connection activities can also increase higher level functioning, such as increases in creativity and problem-solving.

Cognitive Benefits

In addition to being enjoyable, mindfully spending time in nature has been shown to have restorative effects, especially in terms of our attention span and our ability to focus and concentrate.

Environmental Benefits

People with higher levels of nature-connection often do more for nature, both in terms of reducing their impact on the environment and through taking positive actions to restore it.

Human Connections

Higher nature-connection can counteract the negative effects of a lack social connectedness on wellbeing, by offering an alternative way for individuals to connect with the world around them.
