Abstract

We describe a method for modeling spatial context to enable video anomaly detection. The main idea is to discover regions that share similar object-level activities by clustering joint object attributes using Gaussian mixture models. We demonstrate that this straightforward approach, using orders of magnitude fewer parameters than competing models, achieves state-of-the-art performance in the challenging spatial-context-dependent Street Scene dataset. As a side benefit, the high-resolution discovered regions learned by the model also provide explainable normalcy maps for human operators without the need for any pre-trained segmentation model.

1. Introduction

Determining whether an event observed in a video stream is anomalous often depends on its spatial context. For example, pedestrians are expected on sidewalks and cyclists in bike lanes, but not vice versa. In real-world video anomaly detection, the appearance and motion of objects alone are insufficient to classify anomalies; we should learn the “normal” behavior of objects at different locations in the video based on long-term observation.

A major trend in modern video anomaly detection (VAD) algorithms is to train convolutional auto-encoders using a reconstruction proxy task [8, 10, 20]. Future frame prediction [13, 14, 17, 20] can be considered a special form of reconstruction that also addresses temporal regularity. These reconstruction-based methods have achieved great success on widely adopted VAD benchmark datasets, such as UCSD Ped2 [33], CUHK Avenue [16], and ShanghaiTech [14]. However, we observe a large performance drop when such algorithms are applied to datasets in which spatial context plays a critical role in making the anomaly decision, such as the relatively new Street Scene benchmark dataset [23]. One reason is that convolutional auto-encoders are poorly suited to learning spatial context due to their shift-invariant nature [9].

Figure 1. A toy example of building spatial context. Using the discovered semantically meaningful regions, spatial-context-dependent anomalies can be easily detected.

In contrast, high-performing VAD algorithms on the Street Scene dataset (e.g., [23, 25]) usually separate videos into hundreds of rectangular subregions, each with a dedicated normalcy model. Hundreds of subregions not only result in hundreds of normalcy models but also reduce model robustness due to the small number of available object samples per region. However, a typical surveillance camera does not capture hundreds of small regions with different normalcy patterns; meaningful regions should be automatically discovered from long-term observations.

Fig. 1 illustrates a toy experiment mimicking a typical street scenario. Suppose we can extract representations like “pedestrians walk or jog on the sidewalk,” “cyclists ride within the bike lane,” and “cars move quickly in the traffic lane in the correct direction” from training videos. Then, given a new event represented in the same “region-object-attribute” form, we should be able to achieve an almost perfect anomaly detection result. Leveraging object categories and their corresponding attributes is already widespread in the VAD community [19, 24, 28]. However, automatically extracting consistent spatial regions based on these behaviors and using them as the basis for anomaly detection is relatively unexplored territory.

In this paper, we describe a natural approach to discovering spatial regions that have similar expected object motion

Spatial And Contextual Models In Political Research:

Spatial And Contextual Models In Political Research M Eagles,1995-05-24 After decades of relative neglect spatial and contextual models of political life have become increasingly popular These models are vital in recognising the importance of the geographic settings and group environments for an understanding of a wide variety of political phenomena They confront a number of methodologically challenging problems such as untangling nested and multi level contextual effects and problems of cross level inference Understanding how spatial and social contexts both constrain and provide opportunities for political action remains an important research frontier in the social sciences This text presents a number of studies by political scientists and geographers that explore important research questions in both disciplines Several contributions address ongoing debates concerning the magnitude and causal mechanisms responsible for contextual effects on political attitudes and behaviour Other contributions present spatial analyses of a variety of political phenomena ranging from the distribution of electoral support for political parties to the diffusion of judicial innovations within a country There are also many contributions which cover methodological issues in spatial analysis and demonstrate the application of and potential for developing geographic information systems GIS technology for the analysis of political phenomena These issues are raised in the context of political research in a number of advanced industrial countries including Britain Italy and the United States The book is accessible interdisciplinary and comparative in its approach to the spatial and contextual analysis of political phenomena The contributions establish the vitality and importance of this dimension demonstrating how spatial and contextual perspectives can effectively be incorporated into political research in a variety of countries
