14.1 Introduction

There are many ancient and modern methods of studying literature and culture. With these methods, literature has been explained in its own way through the science of literature, Linguistics, Aesthetics. The method of study of comparative literature has been in vogue since the nineteenth century. Along with this, literature has been understood through the methods of sociology, psychology, structuralism etc. A new form of literature emerges from these methods, so comparative literature has also given a new understanding of the form of literature. Therefore, we are trying to understand this discipline in detail.

14.2 Beginning of Comparative Literature

Scholars of comparative literature believe that the term Comparative Literature was firstly introduced in the collection Course de litterature compare published in 1816 in France. The use of comparative literature in Germany dates back to 1854. For the first time in 1818, Mathew Arnold put forward the concept of comparative literature in English.

This means that the concept of comparative literature came to the fore in the nineteenth century. In which the method of studying more than one literature was developed. The second point is that this is not a literary movement. Departments of comparative literature were established in
