Too poor to science: How wealth determines who succeeds in STEM

Craig R. McClain *

Department of Biology, University of Louisiana at Lafayette, Lafayette, Louisiana, United States of America

STEM is profoundly shaped by wealth, yet financial privilege is rarely acknowledged in discussions of diversity and inclusion. Wealth influences participation, persistence, and recognition in science, affecting not just who enters the pipeline but also who can afford to stay.

Behind the pursuit of scientific discovery lies a less-visible truth: a career in science, technology, engineering, and mathematics (STEM) is economically unsustainable, if not entirely unfeasible, for many. The myth of meritocracy in science collapses under the financial sacrifices expected at every career stage. From unpaid internships and self-funded conferences to underpaid graduate and postdoctoral positions, the hidden costs of ‘doing science’ are profound. These burdens disproportionately exclude those without generational wealth, compounded by race and gender. As federal funding declines and diversity, equity, and inclusion (DEI) initiatives are stripped away in the US, financial divides are widening into chasms, making science less accessible, equitable, and innovative. Ignoring these economic realities risks endangering the future of STEM.

Financial barriers emerge early, restricting students’ ability to build academic capital needed for STEM success. Attending a well-resourced and funded high school provides distinct advantages in terms of STEM exposure, preparation, and eventual access to competitive postgraduate programs [1]. Home resources also matter; students with limited access to computers at home consistently perform worse academically [2]. After-school programs improve academic outcomes but costs and transport often exclude students from low-income backgrounds [3]. Summer camps and enrichment opportunities offer vital development [4,5] but are often prohibitively expensive [6], worsening disparities. Many students from low-income backgrounds work during high school to support families, which negatively affects grades, test scores, and long-term goals, even at low weekly work hours [7]. Undergraduate students face additional financial barriers that hinder entry and success in STEM careers [8]. Attending a prestigious (often costly) college or university

Who Succeeds In Science:

Who Succeeds in Science? Gerhard Sonnert, Gerald James Holton, 1995 Why don't more women become scientists And why do those who do become scientists often face more difficulties than their male counterparts Every year about a quarter of a million young men and women in the United States receive their first academic degree in science mathematics or engineering A small fraction will eventually become research scientists But many who start out with that goal fail to reach it for reasons that may have less to do with their scientific ability than with their gender Drawing on a wealth of information 699 questionnaires and 200 interviews from men and women who gave every promise of scientific achievement Gerhard Sonnert and Gerald Holton illuminate the partly gender driven dynamics of the leaky scientific pipeline At the heart of this book are gripping personal life stories of ten women and ten men half became highly successful scientists the rest left research science In their own voices they talk candidly about their career paths the obstacles and assists they encountered the difficulties and rewards of attempting to combine a family life with a science career This highly readable analysis of the gender dimension in scientific careers and its clear headed advice will be of great interest to everyone considering a career in science as well as to teachers parents and active scientists Academics in sociology of science and gender studies as well as decision makers in the areas of human resources and science policy will also welcome its discussions of general issues and policy recommendations
