1. Introduction

In [Bremdal & Fjellheim, 1991], we presented a collection of papers on the status of expert systems in the Scandinavian countries (Denmark, Finland, Norway, Sweden). The survey showed a healthy state of affairs, with interesting work being reported in diverse theoretical and applied fields. In the introduction to the survey, we stressed the importance attached to user orientation and user participation in expert system development in Scandinavia. This echoes a long tradition within systems engineering in these countries. Another "speciality" is an object-oriented perspective on knowledge modeling and representation, again relying on seminal Scandinavian work on object-oriented systems dating back more than 20 years.

The present survey has a more limited geographical scope than the previous one, in that we restrict our attention to Norwegian developments. We have chosen to group the survey in three parts: Industrial (user) companies, KBS vendors, and research and development institutions. Within each group, we present the main "actors" in Norway and some of their recent projects/products. The individual presentations are largely based on material provided by the company/institution in question. The editor is responsible for the selection and "mild" editing of the submitted material.

Needless to say, such a survey cannot be exhaustive, neither in coverage of relevant groups, nor in their particular projects. Nevertheless, the paper should provide a fairly comprehensive overview. The selection of projects is based on a joint consideration of relevance and technical interest. In each case we summarize the objectives and achievements of the system in question, and additionally provide references (if available) for further information. Towards the end of the survey, we provide a brief summary and present some general observations on the trends in expert system work in Norway.
