Sensory Gating in Schizophrenia Gregory Arden Light,2001 Anomalies in the perception and processing of sensory stimuli have been consistently observed in patients with schizophrenia Event related potential ERP methods allow investigators to sample physiologic brain activity that underlies the early information processing of sensory stimuli permitting the quantification of stimulus processing In this context P50 ERP suppression has been viewed as an operational measure of sensory gating presumed to be linked to experiences of sensory inundation reflecting a neural substrate of active inhibitory mechanisms Jin et al 1998 however found that schizophrenia patients who reported frequent experiences of perceptual anomalies PA had higher levels of P50 suppression compared to patients who rarely or never experienced PA We hypothesized Light and Braff 2000 that level of insight negative symptoms and neuropsychological performance would account for the dissociation between P50 suppression and PA Thus in the present study 52 patients with schizophrenia 20 paranoid 32 nonparanoid were assessed on the following measures P50 suppression Structured Interview for Assessing Perceptual Anomalies the Scale to Assess Unawareness of Mental Disorder Scale to Assess Positive Symptoms Scale to Assess Negative Symptoms and neuropsychological tests of vocabulary and executive functioning Patients were classified using previously established cutoffs on the basis of the presence of PA at least half the time n 25 vs rarely or never experiencing PA n 27 Subjects were also classified on level of awareness of illness 27 aware vs 25 unaware Patients who reported PA s were relatively more aware of their illness had fewer negative symptoms and performed relatively better on neuropsychological tests of executive functioning Contrary to expectations however PA status did not significantly relate to P50 suppression These results support the hypothesis that self reports of phenomenological experiences of sensory inundation are associated with level of insight and other clinical characteristics but not P50 suppression Seven additional studies of gating in this dissertation describe other findings amphetamine reduces P50 suppression in normals P50 suppression and prepulse inhibition can be concurrently measured one session schizotypal personality disordered subjects have P50 suppression deficits and antipsychotic medications may affect P50 suppression in schizophrenia patients
