The Councillor:

At the Councillor's E. Marlitt , At the Councillor s or A Nameless History Just before the operation the miller had made his will as Doctor Bruck and the councillor entered the room they met the lawyers and witnesses leaving it Although outwardly composed the patient must have gone through much agitation of mind his hand had evidently been uncertain for in putting away his papers he had left one of them lying upon the table Noticing this omission after the doctor s arrival he had requested the councillor to lock it up in the safe A second door led from the recess where the safe was placed into an antechamber and there were all sorts of people continually coming and going in the mill The councillor had put away the paper but left the door of the safe unlocked an inexcusable neglect and he hastily went to the little room What would the old man who guarded this precious place of deposit like a dragon have said at seeing his money thus exposed No one could possibly have entered the room the councillor consoled himself by thinking the slightest noise could not have escaped him but he would make sure that everything was in order He opened the iron folding doors as noiselessly as possible there were the money bags untouched and before the packets of valuable papers were ranged columns of glittering gold pieces He glanced rapidly over the paper which in his former natural haste and agitation he had put carelessly into one of the neatly arranged pigeon holes it was an inventory of the miller s entire possessions What enormous sums those rows of figures represented He carefully put it where it belonged and in doing so he accidentally overthrew one of the columns of gold pieces a number of napoleons fell noisily upon the floor What an ugly sound they made He had touched money belonging to another A mixture of terror and uncalled for shame sent the colour to his cheeks he stooped in haste to pick up the money As he did so a heavy body fell upon him from behind and hard coarse fingers clutched his throat
