Systemic Shock Propagation in a Complex System Peter Mitic, 2019 We study the effects of delivering a shock to a complex system comprising components agents that interact in a pairwise fashion independent of other parts of the system and with no central control Such pairwise interactions ensure that the system develops with time in a self determining non linear way If a shock is delivered either to one agent or to many agents simultaneously that shock may be transmitted further thereby resulting in systemic risk The particular points of interest are first the characteristics of the system before and after the shock is delivered The second point is how long it takes the shock to affect the entire system The study proceeds by simulating multiple interactions and is applicable to both social and business contexts The results show that if a shock is applied to all agents in a network the systemic effect of that shock is transmitted very quickly Applying a shock to very few agents results in an idiosyncratic effect only for the agents concerned However if an agent is capable of transmitting the shock further a systemic effect will result The recovery period for agents affected by a systemic shock can be orders of magnitude greater than the time taken for the shock to take effect We also formulate a contagion index to measure the extent of loss by debt default within a group of financial institutions
