

Earth's gravity pulls things toward Earth. Satellites can stay up there because they are orbiting. They are moving at the right speed and right direction to counter the pull of gravity.

If the satellite has the correct velocity (1), it will be able to counter the pull of gravity (2). We call it "orbiting."

The correct velocity depends on the distance from Earth & the shape of the intended orbit.

A low-orbit satellite will continuously lose speed due to drag. Without boosting, it will eventually fall toward Earth.

Flat-Earthers claim that satellites should fall down if gravity pulls toward Earth. In reality, we do not just launch satellites to space. We also give them the correct speed and direction, so they neither fall toward Earth nor keep going farther away.
