

An Introduction to the Thorium Fuel Cycle

U-233 captures a neutron and fissions. When the atom fissions it generates 198 MeV of energy.

Pa-233 has a half life of 27 days. Pa-233 beta decays to U-233.

The nucleus splits into two new elements of unequal size, one heavy and one light. In addition, two or three neutrons are released. Many of these elements such as xenon and neodymium can be collected and sold.

Th-233 has half life of 22 minutes. A neutron undergoes beta decay and turns into a proton. The decay releases an electron and an anti neutrino. The resulting element is Pa-233.

The neutrons that come from fission are moving very fast, and are not likely to cause fission or be absorbed. By striking carbon nuclei in graphite they give up almost all of that kinetic energy without being absorbed. The neutrons are then called "thermal neutrons" because they're at the same temperature as the rest of the salt mixture.

Th-232 absorbs a neutron and transmutes to Th-233.
