Abstract

Introduction: It is essential to organize private physicians in urban areas by developing urban family medicine in Iran. Acceptance of this project is currently low among physicians. The present research determined the factors affecting acceptability of the Urban Family Medicine Project among physicians working in the private sector of Mazandaran and Fars provinces in Iran.

Methods: This descriptive-analytical and cross-sectional study was conducted in Mazandaran and Fars provinces. The target population was all physicians working in private offices in these regions. The sample size was calculated to be 860. The instrument contained 70 items that were modified in accordance with feedback from eight healthcare managers and a pilot sample of 50 physicians. Data was analyzed using the LISREL 8.80.

Results: The response rate was 82.21% and acceptability was almost 50% for all domains. The fit indices of the structural model were the chi-square to degree-of-freedom (2.79), normalized fit index (0.98), non-normalized fit index (0.99), comparative fit index (0.99), and root mean square error of approximation (0.05). Training facilities had no significant direct effect on acceptability; however, workload had a direct negative effect on acceptability. Other factors had direct positive effects on acceptability.

Conclusion: Specification of the factors relating to acceptance of the project among private physicians is required to develop the project in urban areas. It is essential to upgrade the payment system, remedy cultural barriers, decrease the workload, improve the scope of practice and working conditions, and improve collaboration between healthcare professionals.

1. Introduction

All Iranians are entitled to free health care at the point of use in accordance with Islamic principles and article 29 of the Iranian constitution. Central principles of the ideology of the Islamic Republic of Iran include "healthcare for all" and "social justice" (Zarenejad et al., 2009); thus, improving the health care system has been a priority for almost 40 years. This was part of a healthcare development program in West Azerbaijan province prior to the Alma-Ata Declaration in 1978. The Iranian primary health care (PHC) network was devised in 1981 by creating health houses in rural areas and health posts in urban areas to provide services before the recent introduction of family medicine (Takian, 2009; Tavassoli, 2008).

The health posts catered to about 12,000 people per post with health technicians trained at the university level providing the services. The health posts referred patients to an urban health center that covered a population of 40-60 thousand people. There are currently 2182 urban health centers; however, the PHC in urban areas are fragile and unstable compared to those in rural areas (Takian, 2009).
