

A group of people, possibly a tribe, are shown from the chest up, looking upwards towards a starry night sky. The Milky Way galaxy is visible in the background, creating a dramatic and contemplative atmosphere. The people are wearing traditional, dark clothing with some headgear.

What was most striking about the long course of human events, Truman had concluded from his reading of history, were its elements of continuity, including, above all, human nature, which had changed little if at all through time. "The only new thing in the world is the history you don't know," he would one day tell an interviewer.
