

The Agricultural Negotiations in the Uruguay Round and the Developing Countries

Alan Matthews

As the mid-term review of the GATT round of trade negotiations approaches, Alan Matthews of Trinity College, Dublin considers the agricultural negotiations as they affect developing countries. He reviews studies of the probable effects of agricultural trade liberalisation on developing countries and discusses the optimal negotiating strategy for developing countries in the Uruguay round.

Introduction

The Uruguay Round marks the eighth time since the Second World War that members of the GATT (the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) have initiated a round of negotiations to reduce trade barriers in a multilateral framework. During this period the multilateral format has had considerable success; average tariffs in the major industrial countries declined from about 40 per cent in the mid-1940s to less than 5 per cent following the most recent Tokyo Round (1974-79). This move to a more open trading system was of fundamental importance to the ninefold increase in world trade and more than fourfold increase in world real income between 1950 and 1985.

The present round has been inaugurated in rather inauspicious circumstances (Timoney 1986 surveys the background). Continuing high unemployment and trade imbalances, the huge swings in competitiveness arising from exchange-rate fluctuations and the apparent threat from increased imports from the low-cost newly industrialising countries, have led many industrial countries to reintroduce restrictions on access to their domestic markets, particularly through nontariff measures which are less easy to police and regulate within the GATT framework. Thus a major objective in the present negotiations is to bring under control and to roll back the proliferation of non-tariff barriers to trade in recent years. Secondly, in view of the growing importance of traded services (banking, insurance, shipping, etc.), countries with a strong competitive position in providing these services are insisting that a start be made
