MATT LIND

ANIMATOR / TECHNICAL DIRECTOR

SOFTIMAGE CERTIFIED INSTRUCTOR: SOFTIMAGE|3D, SOFTIMAGE|XSI

Anthony Rossano: Tell us what you do.

Matt Lind: I don't have an official title as I wear a lot of hats. Appropriate descriptions would be character animator, technical director, 3D instructor, and perhaps project trouble shooter. I figure out how to get the important day to day stuff done efficiently, such as moving file data around, making characters move quickly, and creating tools for tasks performed repeatedly in whatever software happens to be used at the time. What really turned me on to 3D was a film noir cartoon project I worked on back in college. It involved a little thief character who performs actions to music, much like Disney's "Peter and the Wolf," but in sync to Duke Ellington instead of classical music. In doing this project, I discovered that I needed to do it in 3D to get the most out of the idea. 2D just didn't have the full potential. Being able to sculpt the characters in light and shadow, providing depth – that was really important.

ATR: People seem enthralled by 3D animation more than 2D. What is it about 3D images that is so much more appealing than 2D images?

ML: I think people connect with 3D more because no matter where they are or what they do on this planet, everything is 3D – even if they are looking at pictures. People like to feel that connection even to something as outrageous as a cartoon. Also, in this particular day and time it is something new they haven't seen a lot of.

ATR: Do you think that like 2D animation in the 1970s, 3D animation could get overblown, and people might get sick of 3D characters?

ML: I think that's true of almost anything, whether it be fashion, politics, sports, etc. There's usually a sharp increase in popularity until people reach a point of saturation, then it crystallizes for a while. After a little time it comes back to a certain level of popularity and stays there.

ATR: How far out in the future is that for 3D animation?

ML: It's still out the opening, because the people who make the content are able to do new things they couldn't do even five years ago. But now they can do it more quickly and at lower cost.

Manufacturing is a good example as prototypes traditionally had to be created and photographed on a stage which can take anywhere from a few weeks to a few months. Besides being slow, it's also expensive. If designs change, then the process must be performed all over again. Today, the turnaround can be significantly less using data from a CAD/CAM system to render out images as if they were real, playing with color and lighting, then sending them on to print. When revisions are made to the original designs, it's often just a few minor tweaks to update the rendered images.

ATR: Do you think 3D is growing into industrial applications?

ML: Not many companies are using 3D that way now outside of automotive design. Quite a few still use the photographic process, but that is changing as we speak.
