THERE was a man named Lessingham dwelt in an old low house in Wasdale set in a gray old garden where yew trees flourished that had seen Vikings in Copeland in their seedling time Lily and rose and larkspur bloomed in the borders and begonias with blossoms big as saucers red and white and pink and lemon colour in the beds before the porch Climbing roses honeysuckle clematis and the scarlet flame flower scrambled up the walls Thick woods were on every side without the garden with a gap north eastward opening on the desolate lake and the great fells beyond it Gable rearing his crag bound head against the sky from behind the straight clean outline of the Screes Cool long shadows stole across the tennis lawn The air was golden Doves murmured in the trees two chaffinches played on the near post of the net a little water wagtail scurried along the path A French window stood open to the garden showing darkly a dining room panelled with old oak its Jacobean table bright with flowers and silver and cut glass and Wedgwood dishes heaped with fruit greengages peaches and green muscat grapes Lessingham lay back in a hammock chair watching through the blue smoke of an after dinner cigar the warm light on the Gloire de Dijon roses that clustered about the bedroom window overhead He had her hand in his This was their House Should we finish that chapter of Njal she said She took the heavy volume with its faded green cover and read He went out on the night of the Lord's day when nine weeks were still to winter he heard a great crash so that he thought both heaven and earth shook Then he looked into the west airt and he thought he saw thereabouts a ring of fiery hue and within the ring a man on a gray horse He passed quickly by him and rode hard He had a flaming firebrand in his hand and he rode so close to him that he could see him plainly He was black as pitch and he sung this song with a mighty voice Here I ride swift steed His flank flecked with rime Rain from his mane drips Horse mighty for harm Flames flare at each end Gall glows in the midst So fares it with Flosi's redes As this flaming brand flies And so fares it with Flosi's redes As this flaming brand flies Then he thought he hurled the firebrand east towards the fells before him and such a blaze of fire leapt up to meet it that he could not see the fells for the blaze It seemed as though that man rode east among the flames and vanished there After that he went to his bed and was senseless for a long time but at last he came to himself He bore in mind all that had happened and told his father but he bade him tell it to Hjalldi Skeggi s son So he went and told Hjalldi but he said he had seen the Wolf s Ride and that comes ever before great tidings They were silent awhile then Lessingham said suddenly Do you mind if we sleep in the east wing to night What in the Lotus Room Yes I m too much of a lazy bones to night dear she answered
