Virginia's Attitude Toward Slavery and Secession Beverley Bland Munford,1909 This work is designed as a contribution to the volume of information from which the historian of the future will be able to prepare an impartial and comprehensive narrative of the American Civil War or to speak more accurately The American War of Secession No attempt has been made to present the causes which precipitated the secession of the Cotton States nor the states which subsequently adopted the same policy except Virginia Even in regard to that commonwealth the effort has been limited to the consideration of two features prominent in the public mind as constituting the most potent factors in determining her action namely devotion to slavery and hostility to the Union That the people of Virginia were moved to secession by a selfish desire to extend or maintain the institution of slavery or from hostility to the Union are propositions seemingly at variance with their whole history and the interests which might naturally have controlled them in the hour of separation
