A MINING TOWN ON THE HUDSON

This stretch of the Hudson River valley was occupied by a growing mining community, following the discovery of rich iron ore in 1826, and continuing until 1858.

Mining operations ceased and the village was abandoned due to a series of calamities: the death of financial backer Archibald McTear, a downturn in the global economy, and devastating floods that washed out the dams.

The building before you, the McNaughton Cottage, is the only wood frame structure that remains from the iron mining era.

BIRDSEYE VIEW c1854

Much of the town on the valley sides was cleared and burned for charcoal and ironwood, and used for building material. The Hudson was dammed for power, and a building community was born from the wilderness.

SELF-RELIANCE vs. DEPENDENCE

There was no daily access to the remote location from settled areas in the Thompson Valley to the west; the community had to be self-reliant, but the people and the industry were also dependent on getting critical supplies from the east and exporting the iron that was their lifeline. The difficult connection to eastern markets was one of the major reasons the entire operation was abandoned.

ADIRONDAC UPPER WORKS 2014

SECOND GENERATION GHOST TOWN

All the iron ore buildings, except the McNaughton Cottage, had disappeared by the late 1930s. All except one and that today was the remnants of a village built during the Civil War. The only one that remained was the McNaughton Cottage, which was built in 1847. The building had served as a residence, but the building was used as a school and a store. The building was abandoned in 1937. The community was abandoned a second time in 1940 when the mines, primary industry, and the dam were closed and the town was abandoned.
