ABSTRACT

This paper reports on the interventionist study on the role that Rose's (2005) Reading to Learn methodology plays in transforming primary school teachers' perceptions of the role of explicit teaching of reading for educational success. Located within the qualitative case study design, the study used semi-structured interviews and the reading literacy intervention called Reading to Learn methodology to generate data. The study was conducted in grades 3 and 6 classrooms in a rural primary school in KwaZulu-Natal province, South Africa, and the research site and study participants were selected purposively. Research findings reveal that the Reading to Learn methodology has the potential to undo classroom practices that favour the elite and marginalise the majority, and transform teachers' perceptions of the 'place' of teaching reading explicitly within formal education. With sufficient exposure to this pedagogy, learners across class lines have the opportunity to experience education for all, epistemological access, and education for success.

The trajectory of these results points to some serious deficiencies, necessitating the adoption of literacy interventions in schools in many education systems and calling for concerted efforts by researchers to diagnose these untenable trends. In Ribbens (2008: 106) words:

Poor levels of academic literacy are a matter of concern and reading intervention campaigns have been put in place, not only locally, but also in America and the United Kingdom. The front page of The San Francisco Chronicle of 16 August 2006 reads: 'Fewer than half of California's learner can read or calculate at grade level nearly a decade after the state began its top-to-bottom overhaul of public education ...' In Britain, too, because of the poor performance of pupils, 2008 has been declared 'National Year of Reading'. In South Africa decisions to tackle the problem afresh were taken before
