

Translating Evaluation Research Findings into Health Policy

Lee Sechrest, Ph.D. and Paul A. Mabe, III, M.A.

Evaluation research findings for health interventions are considered an essential ingredient in health policy development. However, policymaking must consider many factors other than evaluation findings such as economic issues, political considerations, social, geographic, and logistical feasibility. Thus it is discovered that policy must, or even should match evaluation results. Appropriate functions of evaluation research in the policymaking process are discussed, and obstacles to effective implementation of research findings are examined. It is concluded that through cooperative efforts of policymakers and evaluators evaluation research should become a routinized aspect of policymaking.

In this paper we will argue that the results of systematic evaluations of interventions undertaken to improve the health of the public are an essential ingredient in the decision process that results in the formulation of policy. If it is not known whether an intervention is effective, we assert that the intervention should not under any circumstances become a part of policy. That an intervention known to be ineffective should become a part of policy is, or should be, unthinkable. On the other hand, we believe that the establishment of policy is usually a complex, multidimensional process in which effectiveness of an intervention is only one of a number of issues that will have to be taken into account (Weiss, 1973).

Our discussion will make liberal use of examples from the field of emergency medical services, since that is the area in which
