

During the 1990s, the American business community witnessed a dramatic transformation. The once-dominant model of mass production and mass marketing was challenged by a new paradigm of customer-centricity and personalization. This paradigm shift was driven by technological advancements, particularly in computing and telecommunications, which enabled businesses to interact with their customers in ways previously unimaginable. The result was a new era of marketing, one that focused on understanding the individual needs and desires of each customer and tailoring the marketing message accordingly.
