Work In The New Economy:

New Rules for a New Economy Stephen A. Herzenberg, John A. Alic, Howard Wial, 2000 Three quarters of the American workforce is now employed in services a substantial portion in low paying dead end jobs Can the service economy do as well by the American worker as the old manufacturing economy Can the widely shared prosperity that accompanied steady increases in productivity and performance in manufacturing be replicated in the services They can and they will the authors of this timely book contend but only if outmoded policies and practices are brought into line with the new economy New Rules for a New Economy explains why this must be accomplished and how we can start The authors call for new decentralized institutions suited to a dynamic economy in which change is constant and rapid In particular they see a need for job ladders and worker associations that cut across firm boundaries These institutions would foster individual and collective learning mark out career paths and facilitate coordination among both individuals and organizations in a networked economy The authors propose new rules to reshape labor market institutions and policy improving economic performance and opportunities for workers Unusual in providing a comprehensive theoretical perspective that is grounded in detailed case research this book points the way to a better future not just for elite knowledge workers but for everyone

The New Geography of Jobs Enrico Moretti, 2012 Makes correlations between success and geography explaining how such rising centers of innovation as San Francisco and Austin are likely to offer influential opportunities and shape the national and global economies in positive or detrimental ways

Employment Relationships in the New Economy David Neumark, Deborah Reed, 2002 It is often argued that new economy jobs are less likely to use traditional employment relationships and more likely to rely on alternative or contingent work When we look at new economy jobs classified on the basis of employment in high tech industries we do not find greater use of contingent or alternative employment relationships However when we classify new economy workers based on residence in high tech cities contingent and alternative employment relationships are more common even after accounting for the faster employment growth in these cities Finally defining new economy more literally to be those industries with the fastest growth yields the most striking differences as workers in the fastest growing industries are much more likely to be in contingent or alternative employment relationships with a large share of this difference driven by employment in the fast growing construction and personnel supply services industries where employment is perhaps intrinsically contingent or alternative While subject to numerous qualifications the combined evidence gives some support to the hypothesis that the new economy may entail a possibly significant and long lasting increase in contingent and alternative employment relationships
