

New Theory of Flight

Johan Hoffman,^{*} Johan Jansson¹ and Claes Johnson[‡]

Abstract

We present a new mathematical theory explaining the fluid mechanics of subsonic flight, which is fundamentally different from the existing boundary layer-circulation theory by Prandtl-Kutta-Zhukovskiy formed 100 year ago. The new theory is based on our new resolution of d'Alembert's paradox showing that slightly viscous bluff body flow can be viewed as zero-drag/lift potential flow modified by 3d rotational slip separation arising from a specific separation instability of potential flow, into turbulent flow with nonzero drag/lift. For a wing this separation mechanism maintains the large lift of potential flow generated at the leading edge at the price of small drag, resulting in a lift to drag quotient of size 15 – 20 for a small propeller plane at cruising speed with Reynolds number $Re \approx 10^7$ and a jumbojet at take-off and landing with $Re \approx 10^8$, which allows flight at affordable power. The new mathematical theory is supported by computed turbulent solutions of the Navier-Stokes equations with a slip boundary condition as a model of observed small skin friction of a turbulent boundary layer always arising for $Re > 10^6$, in close accordance with experimental observations over the entire range of angle of attacks including stall using a few millions of mesh points for a full wing-body configuration.

1 Overview of new theory of flight

We present a new theory of flight of airplanes based on computational solution and mathematical analysis of the incompressible Navier-Stokes equations with Reynolds numbers in the range $10^6 - 10^9$ of relevance for small to large airplanes including gliders. The new theory of flight explains how an airplane wing can generate large lift L at small drag D with a lift-to-drag ratio $\frac{L}{D}$ ranging from 15 – 20 for a standard wing up to 70 for the long thin wing of an extreme glider, allowing flight at affordable power, which can be viewed as a form of a miracle of real physics.

We show that the flight of an airplane is computable with millions of mesh points, without any need of resolving turbulent boundary layers because their effect of small skin friction shows to be small on main flow characteristics such as lift and drag. By
