Stormwater Infiltration at the Scale of an Individual Residential Lot in North Central

Florida Justin Haig Gregory,2004 A model soakaway was parameterized using field experiments The performance of a soakaway was then simulated using 4 years of measured rainfall data It was found that the soakaway effectively infiltrated the runoff from a roof with only one failure during that period A lot level hydrological model was developed to simulate the hydraulic and hydrologic processes that occur on a lot The model was used to compare the effectiveness of four lot level stormwater management scenarios during five rainfall events Simulation results showed that promoting infiltration on a lot could be an effective method for managing stormwater at the lot scale
