

for jumping. Some fossil evidence has been interpreted⁵ as suggesting that Deinonyctus, hunting in packs, may have preyed on dinosaurs much larger than themselves. Although this suggestion has been challenged⁶, it has been widely assumed that Deinonyctus leapt onto the backs and flanks of their victims, using enormous claws to get a firm grip⁷. Similarly, lions and other big cats use their sharp claws to grip the hide of their prey, while using their teeth to attack the vulnerable structures of the throat.

There are several drawings on the Internet showing Deinonyctus in mid-air, jumping onto large prey. Some of the drawings show the animal jumping improbably high, but it is pleasing to see that several of them show the tail swung upwards in the manner used by agamas, as reported by Libby and colleagues¹. ■

Progenitors of type Ia supernovae

A study of the remains of a type Ia supernova whose light swept past Earth about 400 years ago finds no sign of a companion star. The result indicates that the supernova's progenitor was a pair of white dwarfs. SEE LETTER P.164

PILAR RUIZ-LAPUENTE

Type Ia supernovae are not just another class of star explosion. They have a pivotal role in cosmology. Measurements of their brightness as a function of their distance from Earth have provided evidence^{1,2} that the Universe is expanding at an accelerating rate. However, from the very beginning of the study of these objects, one major worry has been that we do not know exactly what their progenitors are. On page 164 of this issue, Schaefer and Pagnotta³ describe an analysis that provides insight into the progenitor of a type Ia supernova.

Type Ia supernovae are thought to originate from a white dwarf and a companion star in relatively close proximity to one another. According to this hypothesis, the white dwarf — a dense remnant star, composed of carbon and oxygen, that marks the final evolutionary stage of the vast majority of stars — accretes matter from its companion until it reaches a limit known as the Chandrasekhar mass (about 1.4 times the mass of the Sun). At this point, explosive thermonuclear reactions take place at its centre and the resulting flames propagate all the way to the star's surface, completely disrupting the star and ejecting its material at high speeds.

But the nature of the white dwarf's companion star is unknown. It could be anything: a main-sequence star, which is powered by the fusion of hydrogen into helium; a star in a more advanced evolutionary stage than the main-sequence phase, such as a subgiant, a red giant or a supergiant; or another white dwarf. In the case of a white-dwarf companion, the two-star system, which is technically known as a double-degenerate progenitor, is destroyed in the runaway accretion process that precedes the explosion. In all other cases, known as single-degenerate progenitors, the companion should survive the explosion. This distinction has led astronomers to search for surviving companion stars at the sites where type Ia supernovae have occurred.

In their study, Schaefer and Pagnotta set out to look for a companion star to the supernova remnant SNR 0509–67.5 (Fig. 1) in the Large Magellanic Cloud, a satellite galaxy of the Milky Way. SNR 0509–67.5 is the aftermath of a type Ia supernova whose light swept past Earth about 400 years ago. To search for the companion, the authors analysed archive images of the supernova remnant taken with the Hubble Space Telescope. On the basis of their image analysis, they discard the possibility of a companion star with a luminosity greater than 3% of that of the Sun. This means that stars ranging from supergiants (which are at least 8,000 times more luminous than the Sun) and red-giant stars (about 100 or more times the Sun's luminosity) down to main-sequence stars of the cool type K (with luminosities roughly 10% of that of the Sun) can all

Figure 1 | Supernova remnant SNR 0509–67.5. Schaefer and Pagnotta's analysis³ of SNR 0509–67.5 indicates that the progenitor of this system was a pair of white dwarfs. The remnant, which consists of a rapidly expanding bubble of hot gas, is seen here in an image that combines visible-light observations from the Hubble Space Telescope (pink and surrounding star field) with X-ray data from the Chandra X-ray Observatory (blue and green). The bubble is about 7 parsecs (23 light years) across.
