

and experience even are only accepted by them when they are supporting their own opinions, corroborating their own views. But whenever any truth contravenes their belief, what they hold to be true; whenever any facts or experiences, any results of scientific disquisitions explode their old fashioned, untenable, yet to them venerable notions, then their ire is roused; their zeal fired. They not only refuse to hear calmly, to investigate impartially the claims or merits of an opposite truth, but reject it with contempt, without deigning, or rather daring, to inquire into its merits. Yea, more! They not only reject such, to them new, truths, facts or results with indignation, but even scorn, hate, condemn and persecute those who maintain, promulgate or defend them. And yet it is but these impartial investigations into the nature of things; these scientific divings into the recesses of nature and the bringing out of hidden truths by them; these fearless soundings of facts in order to enrich and rectify our knowledge that ought to be the foundation of our belief, the monitors of our actions; as it is they that constitute and manifest the excellence and superiority of man over mere brutes. For man does not, and shall not, act unthinkingly—moved only by mere instinct—but by reasoning consciousness. He shall, therefore, not be satisfied with the sum of already acquired truths, but shall never cease to examine, strive to enlarge and endeavor to augment and improve them; shall for ever aspire to newer and higher truths, to a more and better understanding of nature, to a fuller and better knowledge of himself, the essence of his being and destination, his desires, aspirations and means of his true happiness.
