Media is expected to promote positive stereotypes so that the audience, especially the kids, can be inspired by the images they see on television or movies. Nevertheless, some shows tend to portray negative ideas about black women. Examples of productions that express these negative ideas are "Blank Ink Crew," "Queen Sugar," and "Black-ish." In these programs, the African American women are supposed to yell or shout, ridicule, mock, threaten or use swearing words. The shows depict women of color as mostly angry, confrontational, and aggressive.

Many shows in television carry on these contrary standards about women. Freeman (1) argues that 72 percent of African American women who watch many of the fictional television shows think that these shows negatively depicted them. The percentage is higher when compared to only 46 percent of white women who find media as a source of most of their negative stereotypes in the society. Their views are based on the fact that the broadcasts continually use the same imagery reflecting women as angry, concerned and continuously aggressive towards everything. The actresses depicted as always being in fights with their neighbors, their husbands, their children, or their coworkers. Additionally, the writers may develop the particular episode to prove that these women were the ones who were unreasonable or wrong in the argument.

According to Jacobs (1), "Blank Ink Crew" contains approximately 19 verbally aggressive acts within each one-hour episode. In the show, white men are more hostile than white women. Contrary, the African American women are portrayed as considerably more verbally aggressive than the men in their society. There are instances where the actresses resort to pouring drinks on their fellow characters or even harming them physically. This misrepresentation degrades the African American women in the current contemporary community. Expressing African American women as verbally aggressive 19 times within 60 minutes impacts a wrong message to the viewers.

The ideas the shows present may be due to various unprofessional and unethical factors in the media industry. Zimmerman argues that the leading cause of these standards is a lack of imagination by the writers (1). They prefer to present material that is already considered the truth. These shows implement such approach by converting a complex individual into a stereotypical character. By doing this, the actions of the characters become predictable which means that the shows will attract an already established, thus reliable, audience.

Some of the writers may also fear losing most of their viewers if they dare to present a controversial idea. To most people, an African American woman is under a lot of pressure from many parties in her life. In a show like "Black-ish" Rainbow Johnson is an anesthesiologist who is also as a mother of five. She is featured as being tired and angry all the time because of the m
