

I don't remember feeling interested in writing at all, except for the old story I remember that most of the writing we did in primary school was religious - describing the local church or completing workbooks on religious festivals every year. I don't remember being particularly inspired by that.

At the beginning of secondary school I remember being envious of another student who won a year award in assembly for her calligraphy. I don't remember there being any other awards for writing in the first half of secondary school.

When I started my Open University course in 2000 (2 years after leaving school + having a baby), I had no idea how to write an essay luckily. I studied Spanish (badly) for the first 3 years so I didn't have to do any extended writing for several years. But when I started the compulsory English Language modules, all the essays came as a shock to the system. But I found that I loved the writing and I got really good marks (but not really interested why).

But I do remember enjoying filling in hand-writing practice books at home with my mum + dad. I think that enjoyment had a lot to do with the special pencil that came with the book because my dad had to sharpen it with his pocket knife.

I don't remember much of my writing experiences at secondary school but I do vividly recall the feelings of dread and panic at having to write a history assignment. I spent the whole night in my bedroom desperately trying to write a full sentence, but ended up with a page full of doodles.

Blank paper syndrome has been a constant issue ever since!

I loved all my English Language modules and was really successful and that spurred me on to my post-graduate study. But when I started my Masters, I realised very quickly that I had no idea how to write, research, critically and I had to learn this stuff very quickly! It was a massive learning curve.

Now as a PhD student, writing is both the love of my life and a giver of great joy. I often hate it: my voice, my pace, my inadequacy. But then I read it and it's euphoric + I go back for more!
