Trust is the basis of all social relations A society in which trust is not assured will not in the end endure Trust presupposes the concordance of word and deed Rather than an emotion trust is an attitude based on experience It is not created spontaneously but requires a process of observation and socialization This implies that the preconditions for trust are culturally determined and subject to change Trust is expressed through communication Writing may engender trust and trust may be placed in written texts The contributions to this volume address the complex relationships between trust and writing in the Middle Ages They deal with charters historiography letters political communication and the possibilities of trust in writing Some of the questions addressed are Does writing as a medium engender trust irrespective of the contents of the written text Was trust in writing dependent on trust in an authority Are there suggestions that the written form of the text was meant to confer trust on its contents Did rituals take place before or during the writing of the text or during its handing over to the recipient that were meant to enhance the text's trustworthiness Can changes be observed in the strategies of engendering trust Was trust considered food for reflection in written texts What was considered to constitute a breach of trust The volume is dedicated to Michael Clanchy whose work inspired much of its contents
