

CLONING

Cloning as a reproductive technology arouses more controversy than other reproductive technologies. Images of drone armies or Nazi inspired super-races quickly arise, along with more subtle and far-reaching fears such as humanness valued only within the limited scope of what is understood as desirable within specific cultural contexts.

Cloning is a term popularly used to describe any procedure asexually producing a genetic replica of a biological object. This might be replication of a DNA sequence, a cell or a whole organism, either plant or animal. Identical twins may be said to be clones, as they are formed through cell splitting or mitotic reproduction. To take a cutting from a plant and grow the cutting, is cloning. Scientists have been cloning frogs from around 1970. It is the actual cloning of mammals, the cloning of human tissue and cells and with this, the potential cloning of human beings, which is deeply provocative. Some of the discussion surrounding the alleged human cloning by the Raelian sect may be relevant, but is not addressed here as the claim is yet to be substantiated.

Cloning might be performed for two reasons:

- To produce beings genetically identical to the cell donor. This is known as human reproductive cloning.
- or
- To produce human cell tissue for research or manufacture therapeutic products including tissues for transplantation. This is known as human therapeutic cloning.

In order to perform different tasks within the body, cells are differentiated. From fertilisation until around the 16 cell stage, cells are totipotent, or totally potent. This means they are undifferentiated and are capable of forming into any type of body cell. Theoretically, each totipotent cell might replicate to become a new human being. These totipotent cells are also known as blastomeres and stem cells.

From the 16 cell stage and onwards, cells differentiate. At this stage and until implantation of the blastocyst or very early embryo, into the uterus at around 6 days, differentiation is limited to cells that will become the placenta and cells that will become the foetus. After implantation and with the continuing growth of the blastocyst into the embryo, cells differentiate into the three major tissue types: endoderm or interior gut lining, mesoderm or muscle, bone, blood, and ectoderm or epidermal tissues and nervous system. Cells continue to differentiate further into all body cells. These early differentiated cells are called pluripotent or multipotent cells and are still known as stem cells.
