

The hours pass without a call. I spend time talking with Talia, all the while growing lonelier for Erik. Soon, it's clear something's gone wrong. Then the phone rings. I snatch up the receiver. But it's not from Erik; it's a friend of Mike's who was able to get a phone call. He tells me that the prison officials are leaving Erik in the hole, he won't be released as we were told.

"No," I whisper. Erik must be devastated. "How can they do this?" "I'm not sure they can. He wasn't found guilty of any rules violations. And it's worse than that."

"How?"

"They're recommending him for transfer."

A chill sweeps through me. This has been a terrible fear. Lyle's at Mule Creek State Prison, forty-five minutes away, but CDC's policy has been to keep Lyle and Erik separated. They've never told us why. Every other prison is hundreds of miles away.

I'm in shock. Nobody was expecting this.

I hang up the phone and check on Talia. She's playing her Sponge Bob game. I lift her into my arms and tuck her into bed. I kiss her good-night. Then I trudge back to the kitchen and pour myself a glass of champagne. I'm going to need that drink after all.

The next day I call the prison-just getting someone on the phone is a feat. They won't comment about Erik's situation. Why he's being kept in the hole is suddenly a prison secret. I can't get any answers. By Saturday Erik's recovered from the shock.

"How can they do this, Erik?"

"They can do whatever they want. They try to break families everyday."

"My business is here. Talia's school. This is our home."

He rests his head against the glass. His gaze softens. He runs his hand down the length of the glass. "What I'd give to wrap my arms around you. I'm so sorry you have to go through this. Sometimes...I don't like what you have to deal with to be with me."

My eyes water. I move closer to the glass. "I will always be here for you, Erik."
