

Telematics for education and training: an overview of the DELTA programme

Guy Weets

Coordinator of the European Communities, Directorate General XII, Rue de la Loi 200, B-1049 Brussels, Belgium

Abstract

In 1986 the European Commission started the first systematic work on technologies for education and training. This exploratory action was called DELTA (Developing European Learning through Technology Advance). This paper details the background of this action and provides an overview of activities to date. Future R&D activities within the EU Fourth Framework Program is discussed, in particular with respect to telematics for education and training.

1. Exploratory action 1986–1991

In 1986 the European Commission started the first systematic work on technologies for education and training to pilot projects which in time led to a decision in the European Council on an exploratory action on DELTA (Developing European Learning through Technology Advance). At this time the work was focused on the development of applications specific to teaching and learning, in other words a technology led programme. The objectives were to identify the most promising technologies for production, distribution, and reception, in the life span of the programme, however, it became clear that specific purpose-built workstations and/or software suites were not going to be taken up by the market. On the contrary, the trend identified for the education and training market was that the most successful applications were of multipurpose hard- and software equipment. The technology to provide solutions for the education and training market was already there. What was needed to boost the market and to make R&D effective was on the one hand definition of standards, to minimise the risk involved in developing course ware and services, and on the other hand that more emphasis should be given to pilot experiments to give more insight into cost-effective ways to deliver training using the new media.

2. Third FWP 1992–1994

These experiments were carried forward in the definition of work in the area of Telematics for Flexible and Distance Learning in the third Framework programme which was defined in 1991 with project work starting in 1992 and lasting until the end of 1994. The unifying concept in this phase of the Framework programme was the European Infrastructure for Flexible and Distance Learning. The projects converge towards this goal by concentrating on one of two pillars: create effective distribution systems for distance learning by using the advances in telecommunication networks, e.g. local based and ISDN and on the other hand create applications for effective learning, by developing tool kits and applications to create interactive learning environments, e.g. by the use of simulation [1–3]. The concept behind both is that the learner should be inspired to learn and be brought back in control of the learning situation and have access to education and training resources when and where required in the most appropriate form for the learning purpose.

Although the project work only finished at the end of 1994, already some preliminary conclusions can be drawn. The project work will not result in the establishment of an integrated infrastructure for flexible and distance learning, but a series of networks for specific education and training of specific learner groups have been established. The approach so far has proven to be successful but it has become clear that the user base needs to be broader to establish durable education and training service networks. One way to accomplish this could be through larger scale projects, which are driven by demands from the users and not by technology. Another
