

Delinquency and Icelandic Adolescents' Viewing of Television Violence

GUÐBJÖRG HILDUR KOLBEINS

During the 1990s, discussion about the causes of juvenile delinquency and aggression among children and adolescents became more prevalent in Iceland. Not surprisingly, people blamed the amount of violence in entertainment media for the apparent increase in the juvenile delinquency rate.

For the past four decades or so, a plethora of studies has been conducted on the relationship between aggression and filmed violence. The vast majority of the research has found a positive relationship between viewing of violence and aggressive behavior, no matter whether the studies were done in a laboratory setting (for ex. Bandura et al., 1963) or as longitudinal research (for ex. Huesmann, 1986; Eron & Huesmann, 1986).

After doing a meta-analysis on 217 studies, dating between 1957 and 1990, Paik and Comstock reported that the overall correlation between viewing violence and antisocial behavior is .31. Paik and Comstock argue that "this 10% increase in success rate, or 10 viewers out of 100 being affected by television violence, cannot be dismissed as an insignificant effect" (Paik & Comstock, 1994: 535). However, it should be noted that when the survey design has been used to investigate the relationship between criminal violence and violence viewing, the correlation is only .06 and thus accounting for only 0.4% of the variance (Paik & Comstock, 1994).

Although the tendency has been to assume that television violence is the antecedent to aggressive behavior, i.e. the cause of the behavior, a number of studies has found that although we have a correlation between violence viewing and aggressive/antisocial behavior, aggressive people may actually be seeking out violent material (Bryant, 1989; Gunter, 1983; Black & Bevan, 1992).

When the research, which is reported in this paper, was conducted, the relationship between television viewing and aggressive behavior among Icelandic adolescents was an unknown territory, i.e. no study had attempted to replicate in Iceland the findings from studies elsewhere in the world.

More specifically, the present study attempted to answer the following two questions: Does viewing of violent television shows increase the aggressiveness of Icelandic adolescents? Does viewing violent television shows increase juvenile delinquency, other than aggression, among Icelandic adolescents?

It was expected that:
