Developing Countries Jonathan R. Ferreira, 2012 Congress has created multiple trade preference programs designed to foster economic growth reform and development in less developed countries These programs give temporary non reciprocal duty free U S market access to select exports of eligible countries Congress conducts regular oversight of these programs repeatedly revising and extending them This book discusses the major U S trade preference programs their possible economic effects stakeholder interests and legislative options Trade Preferences and Differential Treatment of

Developing Countries Bernard M. Hoekman, Çağlar Özden, 2005 The issue of SDT has become very topical again following a period during which it was viewed as an outdated concept for the multilateral trading system We therefore devote attention as well to a number of recent contributions that discuss i whether there is a continued need for SDT and ii how this might be designed from both a development recipient objective and from the perspective of the trading system more generally A major theme of the survey is that most of the issues that are debated today were already being discussed in the 1960s We conclude that those who questioned the value of unilateral preferences have proven to be prescient Trade Preferences for Nonreciprocal trade preferences and provisions in the GATT WTO that allow developing countries greater leeway to retain or use protectionist policies are two of the central planks of so called special and differential treatment SDT for developing countries in the multilateral trading system The authors survey the literature on the rationales institutional features and economic effectiveness of SDT A large literature has emerged on SDT in the past 50 years by both proponents and opponents They summarize a number of key contributions on the subject with a special emphasis on the evaluation of the impact of SDT especially preferential market access The issue of SDT has become very topical again following a period during which it was viewed as an outdated concept for the multilateral trading system The authors therefore devote attention as well to a number of recent contributions that discuss 1 whether there is a continued need for SDT and 2 how this might be designed from both a development recipient objective and from the perspective of the trading system more generally A major theme of the survey is that most of the issues that are debated today were already being discussed in the 1960s The authors conclude that those who questioned the value of unilateral preferences have proven to be prescient      Trade Preferences for Developing Countries Drusilla Kae Brown,1986      Trade Preference Erosion Palgrave Macmillan UK,2009-04-15 The multilateral trade system rests on the principle of nondiscrimination Unilateral trade preferences granted by developed countries can help beneficiary countries but can create tensions between preferred developing countries typically beneficiaries from pre existing colonial regimes and other developing countries There is also concern about the potential erosion of these preferences through trade liberalization in the importing countries an issue that has been important in the current negotiations under the Doha Development Agenda of the World Trade Organization Trade Preference Erosion provides the information needed to make informed assessments of the benefits of trade preferences for developing countries the risks associated with the erosion of these benefits and policy options for dealing with these problems The authors provide detailed analyses of specific preference programs and undertake cross country disaggregated analyses of the impact of preferences at the product level Understanding the likely impacts of these programs and how those impacts are distributed is a precondition for formulating appropriate policy responses The authors argue that such responses need to go beyond trade policies and need to include a focus on enhancing the competitiveness and supply side capacity of developing countries This book is a useful and informative guide for policy makers non governmental organizations and others who wish to better understand the debate on the magnitude and impact of preference erosion      Trade Preferences for Developing Countries Martin McEnery,1966      Trade Preferences Vernon Topp,2001      Quantifying the Value of U.S. Tariff Preferences for Developing Countries Judith Myrle Dean,John Wainio,2006 In recent debates trade preference erosion has been viewed by some as damaging to developing countries and by others as insignificant except in a few cases But little data have been available to back either view The objective of this paper is to improve our measures of the size utilization and value of all U S nonreciprocal trade preference programs in order to shed light on this debate Highly disaggregated data are used to quantify the margins coverage utilization and value of agricultural and nonagricultural tariff preferences for all beneficiary countries in the U S regional programs and in the Generalized System of Preferences Results show that U S regional tariff preference programs are generally characterized by high coverage of beneficiary countries exports high utilization by beneficiary countries and low tariff preference margins except on apparel For 29 countries the value of U S tariff preferences was 5 percent or more of 2003 dutiable exports to the United States even after incorporating actual utilization Most of this value is attributable to nonagricultural tariff preferences and to apparel preferences in particular These results suggest that preference erosion may be significant for more countries than many had thought World Bank web site Agreement on the Global System of Trade Preferences Among Developing Countries GSTP SGPC.,1988
