Electrodynamics and Relativity

12.1 The Special Theory of Relativity

12.1.1 Einstein's Postulates

Classical mechanics obeys the principle of relativity: the same laws apply in any inertial reference frame. By “inertial” I mean that the system is at rest or moving with constant velocity.<sup>1</sup> Imagine, for example, that you have loaded a billiard table onto a railroad car, and the train is going at constant speed down a smooth straight track. The game would proceed exactly the same as it would if the train were parked in the station; you don't have to “correct” your shots for the fact that the train is moving—indeed, if you pulled all the curtains you would have no way of knowing whether the train was moving or not. Notice by contrast that you would know it immediately if the train sped up, or slowed down, or turned a corner, or went over a bump—the billiard balls would roll in weird curved trajectories, and you yourself would feel a lurch. The laws of mechanics, then, are certainly not the same in accelerating reference frames.

In its application to classical mechanics, the principle of relativity is hardly new; it was stated clearly by Galileo. Question: does it also apply to the laws of electrodynamics? At first glance the answer would seem to be no. After all, a charge in motion produces a magnetic field, whereas a charge at rest does not. A charge carried along by the train would generate a magnetic field, but someone on the train, applying the laws of electrodynamics

<sup>1</sup>This raises an awkward problem: If the laws of physics hold just as well in a uniformly moving frame, then we have no way of identifying the “rest” frame in the first place, and hence no way of checking that some other frame is moving at constant velocity. To avoid this trap we define an inertial frame formally as one in which Newton's first law holds. If you want to know whether you're in an inertial frame, throw some rocks around—if they travel in straight lines at constant speed, you've got yourself an inertial frame, and any frame moving at constant velocity with respect to you will be another inertial frame (see Prob. 12.1).
