Competitively Inhibited Neural Networks for Adaptive Parameter Estimation Michael Lemmon, 2012-12-06 Artificial Neural Networks have captured the interest of many researchers in the last five years As with many young fields neural network research has been largely empirical in nature relying strongly on simulation studies of various network models Empiricism is of course essential to any science for it provides a body of observations allowing initial characterization of the field Eventually however any maturing field must begin the process of validating empirically derived conjectures with rigorous mathematical models It is in this way that science has always pro ceeded It is in this way that science provides conclusions that can be used across a variety of applications This monograph by Michael Lemmon provides just such a theoretical exploration of the role of competition in Artificial Neural Networks There is good news and bad news associated with theoretical research in neural networks The bad news is that such work usually requires the understanding of and bringing together of results from many seemingly disparate disciplines such as neurobiology cognitive psychology theory of differential equations large scale systems theory computer science and electrical engineering The good news is that for those capable of making this synthesis the rewards are rich as exemplified in this monograph
