immediately had to face new problems among them the threat of nuclear weapons the necessity of rebuilding Europe and stabilizing Japan and the need to contain Communist expansionism across the globe Today the West has had precious little time to celebrate the end of the Cold War before turning to the destabilizing problems of Soviet disintegration and the blatant military aggression of Iraq This volume holds the unpublished lectures and other writings of George F Kennan at the National War College in its first academic year 1946 47 Kennan and his generation having won the war faced the challenges of winning the peace This they did by creating and fostering the policies and structures that we now often take for granted the Marshall Plan the concept of containment and institutions such as the US Department of Defense NATO and the United Nations The National War College itself was an experiment in co educating military and civilian leaders As the first Deputy for Foreign Affairs at the War College George Kennan had no small role in shaping these developments His 1946 47 lectures and papers specially edited for this book in collaboration with Professor Kennan document his thinking on many critical national security topics of those days when the Iron Curtain was falling across much of the world Kennan s patterns of sound critical thinking his idealism tempered by realism his intellectual rigor and command of history and his repeated insistence on America s internal moral and social strength as essential components of national power all help make Measures Short of War valuable reading for any historian or student of international affairs
