The U.S. Cable Television Industry, 1948-1995 Thomas R. Eisenmann, 1998 Chandler observed that under managerial capitalism salaried managers tended to pursue policies that promoted the long term stability and growth of their enterprises The U S cable television industry provides a case study of how managers responded when stability and growth were mutually consistent objectives and when they were mutually exclusive From the late 1950s through the early 1980s agent led newspaper publishers and television broadcasters invested aggressively in the cable business Cable provided an outlet for reinvesting profits from their core businesses where growth opportunities were limited At the same time these media companies increased their long term stability by diversifying into cable because cable threatened to cannibalize their core businesses Beginning in the mid 1980s however investing in cable implied a tradeoff between stability and growth objectives As a wave of mergers swept the cable industry agent led companies avoided acquisitions Managers were concerned that acquisitions would dilute earnings and thus depress their stock prices and that diverting capital from other divisions would precipitate disruptive internal conflict Confronting an increasingly turbulent competitive environment during the first half of the 1990s agent led companies were much more likely to divest cable assets than owner managed firms In agent led companies managers believed that their cable units would require massive capital investments and they were reluctant to bet the company on a business facing so much competitive technological and regulatory uncertainty Owner managers emotionally attached to the cable industry and to the firms they had built and often harboring dynastic ambitions were more reluctant to sell they were willing to gamble on growth The World Television Industry Peter

Dunnett, 2010-12-31 First published in 1990 The World Television Industry uses economic analysis to examine recent changes in the television industry It uses the theory of public good and a model of industrial organization to identify the major forces determining the nature of the television product in the late twentieth century The forces of supply and demand for an unusual product often requiring a double sale to a consumer and to an advertiser are examined as are alternative methods of financing The all pervading role of government is discussed at length Television in Black-and-white America Alan

Nadel, 2005 La couverture indigène Alan Nadel's new book reminds us that most of the images on early TV were decidedly Caucasian and directed at predominantly white audiences Television did not invent whiteness for America but it did reinforce it as the norm particularly during the Cold War years Nadel now shows just how instrumental it was in constructing a narrow conservative and very white vision of America During this era prime time TV was dominated by adult Westerns with heroes like The Rebel's Johnny Yuma reincarnating Southern values and Bonanza's Cartwright family reinforcing the notion of white patriarchy programs that Nadel shows bristled with Cold War messages even as they spoke to the nation's mythology America had become visually reconfigured as a vast Ponderosa crisscrossed by concrete highways designed to carry suburban white drivers beyond the moral challenge of racism racial poverty and increasingly vocal civil rights demands
