

complexity, speaks directly to our emotions, and provides a stimulating work-out for our sensory perception. No wonder so many people fall in love with the stuff.

Once our conscious brain gets involved, we've already processed a ton of information about a wine's aroma and flavors and associated them almost instantly with emotions and memories. Now it's time for that higher-level processing to figure out what we're tasting. The trouble is, as rich as the language processing is in our heads, we simply lack the terminology to describe the potential trillion-odor combinations that we might be experiencing. So wine also gets our creative juices flowing, as our minds work to associate the beautiful onslaught of complex smells with things that we have encountered before (flowers, oak, fruits, vegetables, smoke, and on and on and on).

In a way, wine is brain food. If we focus on it, it provides an opportunity for our brains to engage in a fun intellectual matching game as we try to interpret it. It's also soul food, in that when drinking it, we connect directly with our emotions and past experiences.

How to Taste a Wine

When the wine business gets grief about being too stuffy and full of itself, the art of tasting is almost always the target. And it's usually a fair rap, because most wine—even during critical analysis and wine competitions—is tasted without a whole lot of fanfare or pretentiousness.

You don't need to do much to taste wine more mindfully; you just need to slow your roll and think about each step of the tasting experience as it's happening. At no point in the tasting process does a big deal need to be made, unless you're like me and you get so psyched about what you're tasting that you feel compelled to immediately share how great it is. . . . but this isn't a book about self-control issues. There are only five aspects to tasting wine, and each one is pretty simple. Diving into them is worth a moment or two, because it's helpful to understand why each step is important. Just think of a wine as a teacher, and you're the student—pay attention, and you'll be learning something new in no time.

Tasting Wine

The first four steps of tasting wine are followed by the final step: considering what you've experienced.
