

Security Requirements

Security requirements are the foundation of a secure system. They define the security goals and objectives that the system must achieve. These requirements are derived from the system's mission and the threats it faces. They are then used to design and implement security controls that protect the system and its data.

Security requirements are typically expressed in terms of confidentiality, integrity, and availability (CIA). Confidentiality is the protection of information from unauthorized disclosure. Integrity is the protection of information from unauthorized modification. Availability is the protection of information from unauthorized denial of service.

Security requirements are also expressed in terms of security controls. Security controls are measures that are implemented to protect the system and its data. They can be physical, technical, or administrative. Security controls are designed to address the threats identified in the security requirements.

It is important to ensure that security requirements are clear, concise, and measurable. This allows for the development of security controls that can be effectively implemented and monitored.

The security requirements of a system are defined by the system's mission and the threats it faces.

It is important to ensure that security requirements are clear, concise, and measurable.

1.3 Select controls based upon system security requirements

1.3.1 Security Control Framework

Control	Control	Control	Control	Control	Control
AC-1	AC-2	AC-3	AC-4	AC-5	AC-6
AC-7	AC-8	AC-9	AC-10	AC-11	AC-12
AC-13	AC-14	AC-15	AC-16	AC-17	AC-18
AC-19	AC-20	AC-21	AC-22	AC-23	AC-24
AC-25	AC-26	AC-27	AC-28	AC-29	AC-30

The Security Control Framework (SCF) is a set of security controls that are designed to protect the system and its data. The SCF is based on the system's security requirements and the threats it faces. It provides a structured approach to the selection, implementation, and monitoring of security controls.

The SCF is organized into three levels of controls: basic, intermediate, and advanced. Basic controls are the most fundamental and are required for all systems. Intermediate controls are more sophisticated and are required for systems that handle sensitive information. Advanced controls are the most complex and are required for systems that handle highly sensitive information.

The SCF is used to select and implement security controls that are appropriate for the system's security requirements and the threats it faces. It also provides a framework for monitoring and evaluating the effectiveness of the security controls.

The SCF is a set of security controls that are designed to protect the system and its data.
