

Introduction

The following map shows the future of North America as it will be in the year 2000. It is based on the present topography and geology of the continent, and is a projection of the changes that will take place in the next century. The map is divided into several regions, each of which is described in detail in the accompanying text.

Western Sea

The Western Sea is a large body of water that will form in the western United States. It will cover the area from the Pacific coast to the Rocky Mountains, and will be about 1,000 miles long and 500 miles wide. It will be formed by the subsidence of the western United States, and the rising of the sea level.

Sierra Nevada

The Sierra Nevada is a new mountain range that will rise in the central United States. It will be about 1,000 miles long and 500 miles wide, and will be about 10,000 feet high. It will be formed by the rising of the central United States, and the subsidence of the western United States.

Great Lakes

The Great Lakes is a large lake that will expand into the eastern United States. It will cover the area from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic coast, and will be about 1,000 miles long and 500 miles wide. It will be formed by the rising of the eastern United States, and the subsidence of the western United States.

Other Regions

The map also shows other regions that will be affected by the changes, including the Great Basin, the Colorado Plateau, and the Gulf of Mexico. Each of these regions is described in detail in the accompanying text.
