

Teaching, Academic Achievement, and Attitudes Toward Mathematics in the United States and Nigeria

By S. Marshall Perry, Ph.D., Michael Catapano, Ed.D., and Olosunde Gbolagade Ramon, Ph.D.

Abstract

This paper explores the relationships among attitudes toward mathematics, teaching, and academic achievement in mathematics. Based on the contextual and social nature of academic self-concept, two complementary studies are discussed. The first study from the north-eastern United States examined the relationships among these variables in 84 high school students. A second study from southwestern Nigeria examined how teaching approach can engender changes in student achievement and attitudes toward mathematics through the analysis of 36 preservice teachers associated with 830 students. Instruments used included the Program for International Student Assessment, the June 2012 New York State Integrated Algebra Regents Examination, the Student Mathematics Attitudes Questionnaire, and the Student Mathematics Achievement Test. Analytic methods included descriptive statistics, correlations, linear regression, and analysis of covariance. Together, the research supports the link between attitudes toward mathematics and academic achievement and suggests that teachers can improve student attitudes toward mathematics based on their teaching approach.

Background

Mathematics is a necessary tool needed to be able to function effectively in the present technological age (Aremu, 1998). The present age of information and computer technology (ICT) owes a lot to mathematics (Akinsola and Tala, 2001). Fayemidagba (1991) stated that the teaching of mathematics is very important to all human existence because mathematics is all about finding solutions to problems. Several studies, including Olowojaiye (1998), Ali and Anakwe (1997), and Oyeniran (2007) have indicated the role mathematics can play in the study of other school subjects.

Mathematics educators in Nigeria (Abimbade, 1990; Oladeji, 1995; Esan, 1999; Akinsola, 2001) have carried out research on methods and ways of improving the teaching and learning of mathematics at both the primary, junior and senior secondary school levels for several years. Research centered on effective teaching and learning of mathematics. Despite these efforts, the results of students' performance at both the West African senior secondary school certificate examination (WASSCE) and National examination council (NECO) have not improved significantly (Adetula, 1995; Olowojaiye, 2001). In 2002, the failure rate which was 36.1%; by 2008, it was still high at 25.1%.

The United States is also faced with challenges that can hinder the nation's ability to lead in the field of mathematics. The 2011 National Assessment of Educational Progress, The Nation's Report Card, reported that 27 percent of the eighth-grade students tested from the United States performed below the basic achievement level, while 35 percent were at or above the proficient achievement level. This level of proficiency does not meet the expectations of an international leader (NAEP, 2011).

The rationale to improve mathematics academic achievement in both Nigeria and the United States prompted the examination of two studies discussed in this article. Rather than emphasize instruction or educational policies, which can vary markedly by context, both studies consider the role of ATM. The Nigeria study considers how teacher approaches relate to attitudes toward mathematics (ATM) and the United States study emphasizes the relationship between ATM and academic achievement. The study frames ATM as one part of academic self-concept. Through a critical review of international empirical studies, Marsh and Young (1997) found support for causal effects of both academic self-concept and achievement upon the other. They therefore hypothesized "a 'reciprocal effects' model in which prior academic self-concept affects subsequent achievement and prior achievement affects subsequent academic self-concept" (p. 43). Because academic self-concept is maintained in a social context in which teachers can be significant others (e.g. Hoelter, 1984) it is important to consider not just student academic self-concept, but also the role of teachers or teacher approach. Summarizing prior research, Irvine (1990) cautioned that students who do not believe that their teachers like them may feel isolated and discouraged to the extent that they eventually fail.
