7 VIOLENT VOLCANOES

- Yellowstone, Wyoming, 640,000 years ago
A massive eruption, a supervolcano, is thought to have occurred in about 640,000 BC.
- Mount Tambora, Indonesia, 1815
The largest eruption in recorded history, it killed 100,000 people and caused the "Year Without a Summer" in 1816.
- Mount Pinatubo, Philippines, 1991
An eruption that killed 800 people and caused $3.3 billion in damage.
- Mount St. Helens, Washington, 1980
An eruption that killed 57 people and caused $2 billion in damage.

Volcanic, or extrusive igneous, rocks are born of fire. Magma hits the surface at temperatures of 2,100°F (1,150°C). Bubbling and fizzing with dissolved gas, it explodes violently through volcanoes or oozes slowly from a vent or fissure.

Volcanic rocks form when lava cools and solidifies. They have small grains because they cool quickly, giving crystals little time to grow. Basalt, andesite, and trachyte are the most common lavas on Earth. Because it is so thick, rhyolite magma can cause the most violent eruptions. Most lavas are made up of silicate minerals including feldspar, olivine, amphibole, mica, and quartz. Tuff is a rock formed of volcanic ash, which is sometimes hot enough to weld together. Obsidian, a black volcanic glass, cools too quickly to form crystals. During volcanic eruptions, volcanoes may shoot out lumps of lava called bombs. Dissolved gases pump porous foam-pumice full of frothy bubbles. Pele's hair—named after the Hawaiian fire goddess—is made of long, wispy, mineral fibers that are drawn out in the air as liquid rock erupts.
