Birds Every Child Should Know Neltje Blanchan,1907
Nature the best teacher of us all trains the child's eyes through study of the birds to quickness and precision which are the first requisites for all intelligent observation in every field of knowledge I know boys who can name a flock of ducks when they are mere specks twinkling in their rapid rush across the autumn sky and girls who instantly recognise a goldfinch by its waving flight above the garden The white band across the end of the kingbird's tail leads to his identification the minute some sharp young eyes perceive it At a considerable distance a little girl I know distinguished a white eyed from a red eyed

vireo not by the colour of the iris of either bird's eye but by the yellowish white bars on the white-eyed vireo's wings which she had noticed at a glance Another girl named the yellow-billed cuckoo almost hidden among the shrubbery by the white thumb-nail spots on the quills of his outspread tail where it protruded for a second from a mass of leaves A little urchin from the New York City slums was the first to point out to his teacher who had lived twenty years on a farm the faint reddish streaks on the breast of a yellow warbler in Central Park Many there are who have eyes and see not page vii of preface
