

WHO'S CRAZY HERE, ANYWAY?

Rosenhan, D. L. (1973). On being sane in insane places. Science, 177, 250-258.

The question of how to distinguish between normal and abnormal behavior is fundamental in psychology. The definition of abnormality plays a key role in determining whether someone is diagnosed as mentally ill, and the diagnosis largely determines the treatment received by a patient. The line that divides normal from abnormal is not at all clear. Rather, all behavior can be seen to lie on a continuum with normal, or what might be called effective psychological functioning, at one end and abnormal, indicating mental illness, at the other:

It is up to mental health professionals to determine where on this continuum a particular person's behavior lies. To make this determination, clinical psychologists, psychiatrists, and other psychotherapists may use one or more of the following criteria.

- Context of the Behavior. This is a subjective judgment, but you know that some behaviors are clearly bizarre in a given situation. For example, there is nothing strange about standing outside watering your lawn, unless you are doing it in your pajamas during a pouring rainstorm! So, a judgment about abnormality must carefully consider the context in which a behavior or behavior pattern occurs.
- Persistence of Behavior. We all have our "crazy" moments. A person may exhibit abnormal behavior on occasion without necessarily demonstrating the presence of mental illness. For instance, you might have just received some great news and, as you are walking along a busy downtown sidewalk, you dance for half a block or so. This behavior, while somewhat abnormal, would not indicate mental illness, unless you began to dance down that sidewalk on, say, a weekly or daily basis. This criterion for mental illness requires that a bizarre, antisocial, or disruptive behavior pattern persist over time.
- Social Deviance. When a person's behavior radically violates expectations and norms, it may meet the criteria for social deviance. When deviant behavior is extreme and persistent, such as auditory or visual hallucinations, it is evidence of mental illness.
- Subjective Distress. Frequently, as intelligent beings, we are aware of our own psychological difficulties and the suffering they are causing us. When a person is so afraid of enclosed spaces that he or she cannot ride in an elevator, or when someone finds it impossible to form meaningful relationships with others, they often do not need a professional to tell them they are in psychological pain. This subjective distress is an important sign mental health professionals use in making psychological diagnoses.
- Psychological Handicap. When a person has great difficulty being satisfied with life due to psychological problems, this is considered to be a psychological handicap. A person who fears success, for example, and therefore sabotages each new endeavor in life, is suffering from a psychological handicap.
- Affect or Functioning. The extent to which the behaviors in question interfere with a person's ability to live the life that he or she desires, and that society will accept, may be the most important factor in diagnosing psychological problems. A behavior could be bizarre and persistent, but if it does not impair your ability to function in life, pathology may not be indicated. For example, suppose you have an uncontrollable need to stand on your bed and sing The National Anthem every night before going to sleep. This is certainly bizarre and persistent, but unless you are waking up the neighbors, disturbing other household members, or feeling terrible about it, your behavior may have little effect on your general functioning and, therefore, may not be a clinical problem.

These symptoms and characteristics of mental illness all involve judgments on the part of psychologists, psychiatrists, and other mental health professionals. Therefore, the foregoing guidelines notwithstanding, two questions remain: Are mental health professionals truly able to distinguish between the mentally ill and the mentally healthy? And what are the consequences of mistakes? These are the questions addressed by David Rosenhan in his provocative study of mental hospitals.
