

Current status of reproductive behaviour in Africa

The current annual population growth rate of 3.2% in Africa will double the population by the year 2025. The majority of this population is below 15 years of age, and Africa concurrently also has the highest incidence of infertility in the world. Sexual behaviour, which has been poorly studied in Africa, has a direct impact on reproductive health [including fertility, infertility and sexually transmitted diseases (STDs)]. The multiple cultures and religions which characterize the African continent also affect reproductive health. Factors that have a significant effect on reproductive health in Africa include greater prevalence of extramarital/commercial sexual activity, polygamy, lower prevalence of contraceptives, reliance on traditional practices, high incidence of STDs and teenage pregnancies. High risk reproductive behaviours are predominantly displayed by adolescents, and the prevalence of STDs, including HIV (human immunodeficiency virus), is very high in this group. Pregnancy-related complications are the major cause of health-related problems in 15–19 year old girls. Maternal mortality rates in most countries remain high. Literacy rates affect these behaviours. It is apparent that changing the sexual behaviour of adolescents is one way of reversing the adverse trends, such as STD transmission, unwanted pregnancy and poor general reproductive health.

Introduction

Limited research data have been published on sexual behaviour in Africa, and much of this information has been obtained in urban centres (Bertrand et al., 1991; Carael et al., 1991; Bassett et al., 1992; Rutenberg et al., 1994; Borgdorff et al., 1995). Many of these studies have focused on specialized groups such as factory workers and commercial sex workers (CSW). Furthermore, studies of sexual behaviour in this continent have shown a great variability between the different study sites. As reported in other countries (Carael et al., 1991), it is evident that the data generated from completed questionnaires are generally unreliable (Barton, 1991; Huygens et al., 1996). Central to this issue is the dilemma of obtaining accurate information on a domain of sensitive personal experience considered private in African culture (Ankrah, 1989; Packard and Epstein, 1991).

The general area of sexual behaviour in Africa gathered momentum in the 1980s when three key conferences were held in Nairobi (Kenya). The first one, the 'Nairobi Women's Conference' (1985), clearly demonstrated that women's health had been grossly neglected in the drive for improved primary care. Efforts were being directed at oral rehydration and child immunization while African women were still dying in their thousands from complications of pregnancy [World Health Organisation (WHO), 1996]. The second conference, on 'Safe Motherland' (1987), outlined the serious consequences of maternal mortality and morbidity. It was reported that up to half a million women were dying each year owing to pregnancy and childbirth related complications. It was accepted that avoidance of early teenage pregnancies and good child spacing would make a major impact on saving the lives of women and children, in addition to improving their general health. The third conference, on 'Better Health for Women and Children through Family Planning' (1987), presented outstanding data on the association between the use of contraceptives and reproductive health of women. It was clear that unwanted pregnancies were responsible for some 25–30% of
