Washington the Soldier Henry B. Carrington, 2021-07-22 The boyhood and youth of George Washington were singularly in harmony with those aptitudes and tastes that shaped his entire life He was not quite eight years of age when his elder brother Lawrence fourteen years his senior returned from England where he had been carefully educated and where he had developed military tastes that were hereditary in the family Lawrence secured a captain's commission in a freshly organized regiment and engaged in service in the West Indies with distinguished credit His letters counsels and example inspired the younger brother with similar zeal Irving says that all his amusements took a military turn He made soldiers of his school mates They had their mimic parades reviews and sham fights A boy named William Bustle was sometimes his competitor but George was commander in chief of the school His business aptitudes were equally exact methodical and promising Besides fanciful calligraphy which appeared in manuscript school books wherein he executed profiles of his school mates with a flourish of the pen as well as nondescript birds Irving states that before he was thirteen years of age he had copied into a volume forms of all kinds of mercantile and legal papers bills of exchange notes of hand deeds bonds and the like This self-tuition gave him throughout life a lawyer's skill in drafting documents and a merchant's exactness in keeping accounts so that all the concerns of his various estates his dealings with his domestic stewards and foreign agents his accounts with government and all his financial transactions are to this day monuments of his method and unwearied accuracy
