1. Introduction

Wireless telecommunications systems, exploiting the air as a transmission medium, provide portability and are increasingly taking the place of wired systems even for fixed terminals. However, the air is a shared medium. Compatibility and standards problems are central to the technological issues faced by this industry.

In many countries, notably the United States, wireless communications licenses are being awarded without strict reference to their use and without interoperability standards. The result is a somewhat chaotic state in which many transmission standards coexist. Without government to dictate standards, systems operators must make independent decisions, based largely on technological grounds, concerning their equipment standards. The wisdom of such decisions depends, to large extent, on the quality and detail of technical data available about proposed systems.

The desire to explore some of the finer details of wireless systems was behind the first Wireless Communications Conference, held in Boulder, Colorado in 1996. The great response to this conference led directly to the 1997 Wireless Communications Conference (WCC'97), also held in Boulder, on August 11-13, 1997. WCC'97 was sponsored by the Microwave Theory and Techniques Society of the Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers (IEEE) and by the International Microelectronics and Packaging Society (IMAPS). Technical cosponsors of the event were the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST), the Institute for Telecommunications Sciences (ITS), and the IEEE Communications Society. There were 254 people registered for the conference, an increase of about 50 % from 1996. Attendees came from 14 nations: Austria, Belgium, Canada, Finland, France, Germany, Israel, Japan, Korea, the Netherlands, Spain, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, and the United States; 42 registrants were from outside the United States. Both the 1996 and 1997 conferences were chaired by Dr. Roger Marks of NIST.

One of the essential features of the conference is that it offers a deep view of the industry, from high-level issues such as systems to low-level topics such as components, in a single-track format. As a result, it brings together customer and supplier throughout the supply chain in an interactive format. Attendees have voiced their approval of this opportunity to see the big picture and help address the many wireless communications problems that require an interdisciplinary approach.
